PROGRESS MADE TOWARD LUNDIN PROTECTION IN MIDWAY

MIDWAY CITY COUNCIL PLEDGES $1 MILLION TOWARD OPEN SPACE BOND FUNDS

The vote by the Midway City Council to provide $1 million towards the protection of the Lundin property is a significant milestone. The 119-acre agricultural land near Wasatch Mountain State Park has been in the same family since the late 1800s. For siblings Nora, Randy and Mike Lundin, the property holds great sentimental value.

Utah Open Lands aims to secure a conservation easement on the property. We are seeking financial support from various sources, including Wasatch County, which has already committed $2 million, the FDA's Natural Resource Conservation Service, and the LeRay McAllister Working Farm and Ranch Fund. Early estimates of the conservation easement value place its protection at around $9 million. The Lundin Farm is one of Midway's longest-held family farms, with two structures eligible for the National Register of Historic Places. The house showcases architecture typical of its time, and a stream flows through the root cellar, illustrating food storage practices of the time as a way to keep harvested crops cool.

The property features irrigated pastures, where Heritage Breed Scottish Highland cows graze and century-old plum trees flourish. If protected, this land, along with its water resources, will serve as crucial land for snowmelt absorption while offering trail connections to Wasatch Mountain State Park.

The preservation of Midway's rural character and working lands in Wasatch County is made possible by the support and financial contributions of the Town's and County's citizens. The pledged funds will be leveraged multiple times through external sources and the landowning family's charitable intentions.

"We're willing to do it for the $3 million," said Nora Lundin. "If we can't get any more money, we're OK with that." Mike Lundin agreed with his sister and added "We'd like to get more money to fix fences and improve the farm." While the current budget of $3 million may be enough, UOL will work to acquire additional financial support to address farm improvements and maintenance.

ADVENTURE AWARE GUIDES

Encouraging a transformative shift in how recreators interact with their surroundings, Utah Open Lands launched our Adventure Aware Guides last week. As part of our Leave It Loved campaign, UOL hosted an Adventure Aware Clinic on Tuesday, June 13th, at the Front Climbing Club where attendees had the opportunity to watch a video on Castleton Tower, showcasing how outdoor recreationists can challenge their inner steward. Participants of the clinic left with their very own pocket-sized Adventure Aware Guides and a renewed sense of environmental stewardship. In conjunction with the Adventure Aware Clinic, Utah Open Lands has employed a Recreation, Use, and Education summer intern, who will be stationed at trailheads this summer, offering practical information on "Leave it Loved" practices. This initiative aims to educate trail users about responsible stewardship while simultaneously reducing human impact on open spaces. Adventure Aware Guides are available HERE.
